Abstract: In the scholarly and popular literature, African music is often emphasized as a site for resistance and oppositional politics, while musicians who support the state are seen as tools of propaganda.

The Relationship Between Protest Music and Politics in the 1960s: Events like the Vietnam War and student protests coincided with a larger and more popular movement of political protest music.

When music and politics collide: German composer Kurt Weill believed in writing music that served a purpose socially and politically. A socialist, his most well-known work, the Threepenny Opera, took a Marxist viewpoint on capitalism. Over the years, folk music has been explicitly political, representing the fight against the Vietnam War and student protests.

The intertwining relationship between music and politics: The very nature of politics is like music with a heart in conflict and harmony. The heart of music is the interplay of the physical and the mental, as the promise between them forms a cohesive whole.

The evolution of music: The music revolution of the 1960s was marked by the emergence of protest songs. Singers Bob Dylan and Joan Baez led the movement, and Dylan's Blowin' in the Wind became a civil rights anthem. Music had become a vehicle for social change, with protest songs and psychedelic music of the 1960s serving as the soundtracks to the sexual revolution and anti-war marches.
